Decision making methods that may have helped animals be well-suited to their natural conditions may, in this human-altered modern environment, actually hurt their survival. In a recent paper published in Integrative Zoology, Megan A. Owen and her colleagues from the San Diego Zoo and UCLA investigated the different mechanisms of animal decision-making. To make ADM research applicable for wildlife conservation, they determined that an multidisciplinary approach is needed.

Collective animal behavior is a form of social behavior involving the coordinated behavior of large groups of similar animals as well as emergent properties of these groups. This can include the costs and benefits of group membership, the transfer of information across the group, the group decision-making process, and group locomotion and synchronization. Studying the principles of collective animal behavior has relevance to human engineering problems through the philosophy of biomimetics. For i
